Subject: Series A documentation

Jonathan,

Our lead investor's counsel drafts on an English template and wants a single instrument rather than a subscription agreement plus a separate shareholders agreement. They are calling it an Investment and Subscription Deed. Substantively it does everything a shareholders agreement does — board rights, consent thresholds, share transfer restrictions, the lot.

Can we work with that? I would rather not spend the budget arguing about document architecture.

Wei Ling,

No difficulty at all. The label does not matter; what matters is that the governance and transfer provisions are there and are enforceable under Singapore law. We will work off their deed and make sure nothing falls through the gap between the two structures.

One point to watch: their template calls the veto list "Consent Matters" and the board a "Supervisory Board". We will keep their vocabulary for consistency but define both terms precisely so there is no argument later about what the Supervisory Board actually is for Companies Act purposes.
